Fun in Recovery: Different for All

My idea of what's a good time in recovery is probably not the same as your idea of what's a good time in recovery.

"If you're going to write an article about 'fun in recovery, you have to use the phrase 'we are not a glum lot' at some point," said my friend, who gave me this topic. He's right. It's true: we are not a glum lot. That said, I'm a quiet person. I always have been. I'm very introverted. The spiritual conversion method of recovery through the Twelve Steps appeals to me most because I go on an individual and spiritual journey to get close to my own personal God. For this reason, I was never a meeting maker. I balanced all three sides of the triangle, sure — but to this day, my idea of a good time in recovery is quiet prayer, meditation, writing inventory, savoring moments with individual friends one on one. I don't think I ever closed down a bar in all my years 'out there' — I was very solitary in my addiction, from beginning to bitter end — and I relish the solitude of my spiritual journey. That said, I am careful to balance that with honesty and avoidance of isolation. I pursue public paths — yoga classes, group meditation, small groups of friends, etc. — to be sure I'm not taking Step 11 too far on my own self-will.

Most other people's idea of fun includes barbeques and parties and coffeehouses and meetings and Young People's fellowships and generally being boisterous and grateful and sometimes I am envious of those folks. Extroverts may or may not have an easier time in recovery. Extroverts can go to meetings and events and re-socialize themselves in a way I was never comfortable with: I always preferred hard-core stepwork. It took me a long time to accept that that was all right as long as I challenged myself to grow in recovery. It also took me some time to see that those folks who seemed so confident in social settings were sometimes putting on an act that worked for them in the Great Out There, a show of self and entertainment that I'm not sure always works on a spiritual level. But like everything, it's a balance. There are true spiritual extroverts, the ones that are genial and grateful and doing the work and friendly with everyone and just those all-around, amazing people. They are the ones I stare at, the ones I admire. I don't have that gene. I wish I did.

Common thread — we are all alcoholics in search of, in need of, a spiritual solution. And we seek that solution via any means that feels comfortable to us, any way that we can, based on who we are. It's a balance of direction and experience and insight into our own true character and nature. And it all works. It's just a matter of being willing to pursue.
